What is a Department at a University? – this question arises for many applicants and first-year students, because at school this concept was not met.

Department at a University

A Department at a University is a structural unit of an educational institution, a division of a University. The Department prepares students for a specific specialization, i.e. scientific and methodological work is carried out on one or more related academic disciplines.

Otherwise, we can say that the faculty is a more General concept (for example, law), and within the faculty there are several departments (for example, civil law, criminal law, etc.).

According to the regulations on the Department, the official name of the Department is established when it is created or reorganized by the Academic Council of the University and must correspond to the name of the direction (specialty) of training of specialists for profiling departments, and reflect the name of the field of knowledge for which this Department trains students.

Departments at the University

Departments at the University may have branches, research laboratories, training units for additional professional education and educational services, and pilot production sites.

Academic Council of the University

The Department is headed by a head who is elected by the Academic Council of the University for a term of up to five years from among the most qualified and authoritative specialists of the relevant profile, who usually have a degree or title. The elected head of the Department is appointed by order of the rector of the University.
